SKILLS IN BREAKING BAD NEWS FOR HEALTH WORKERS

1 CFU –MED/09

Breaking bad news is a process of delivering news, which may negatively affect a patient's view of the future, however is an essential skill for doctors. There are a multitude of benefits if doctors can execute this task well, and will improve the disease journey for the patient. There are several published models including the SPIKES and ABCDE models to help guide the doctor to break bad news effectively. This important skill can be taught through various methods but the most effective may be actually observing a session by senior clinicians.

A small-group instructional session on breaking bad news has been a component of the medical student curriculum in the University of Pavia. For some years, faculty/facilitators expressed anxiety and uncertainty in their abilities to facilitate these complex scenarios using role-playing. In order to address faculty concerns the lead author developed a variety of shorter cases that progress through increasingly more difficult clinical scenarios, helped by Colleagues and teachers from Ireland and Israel, where the course is very structured. The author used these shorter clinical scenarios over several years and the sessions were rated equally well by students compared to the original cases. We believe that this new format lent itself to recording as a multimedia module: shorter cases more readily demonstrate the skills of delivering bad news. We believe this recorded adaptation of the breaking bad news session provides a valuable learning opportunity and resource for faculty, especially those with limited experience in facilitating role-playing instructional activities. One drawback in using shorter cases is that students have a limited opportunity to practice the structured format for delivering bad news. Students may need to be given other opportunities in the curriculum to demonstrate their competency in using a structure format.
